Few of the children who enjoy this park have nurses. Most of the rickety wagons are pushed by little mothers who have to strain up to reach the handle, and the baby inside seems far more robust. They piled up the wagons, these little creatures, with bright colors and green leaves, almost burying baby in the unfamiliar beauty, and made for home with a haste and disregard of the unsteady wheels of these chariots that would fill an up town mother with horror. Some of the children dressed their hats with broken leaves, but not one of them mutilated a plant.-New York Herald.

My Loving Little Neighbor.

I have a little neighbor,
A red cheeked boy of five,
With curls of gold about his head
And every limb alive.

He has a darling sister,
A girl of years twice nine,
Upon whose heetic cheek there lurk
The marks of swift decline.

I saw my little neighbor

Just ere the summer's close Go up and down the garden walk With lightly tripping toes.

He spied me at my window
And in a gentle tone
Called me to aid him in his task,
For he was all alone.

Within his tiny fingers

Were akens of silken thread,
Tangled and twisted in his baric,
And thus my neighbor said:
"Oh, picase bend down the branches,
I am so short you know;
Fast as I touch their little tips
Out of my reach they go.

"If you will hold the branches

For me a little bit,
Then I can the three threads around
Each leaf and fasten it."
But why, my lattle neighbor,
Must you the leaves the fact?

Then came a quiver to his lips— His eyes were downward cast.

"Because," he said, "they're saying That when the leaves shall fall My sister dear—my Constantine—

Must go and leave us all.
"I want to tie the leaflets on
So tight and firm that so They cannot fall, and then perhaps
She will not have to go."

"Green Gravel, Green Gravel." One of the most popular games of the mill children of Connecticut and Rhode Island is "Green Gravel." It is played in an immensering, the singers revolving as they chant, and one child facing outward with the end of each stanza, where she is called by name. The revolving continues to the monotonous words until everybody faces away from the center and then concludes. The words to which the children play are these: Green gravel, green gravels. How green the grass grows! And all the Freemasons Are shame to bestown. Dear Annie, dear Annie, Your true love is dead.
